Stomacher¹ (stō'mätjə, stō'mäkəj). Forms: 5 stomakere, stomechere, stomachyr, 5-6 stomachere, 5-6 stomager, 6 stomackger, (8 stomatcher), 6- stomacher [app. f. STOMACH sb. + -ER 1: but see below].

The alleged F. estomachier appears to be recorded only by Palgrave. If it be genuine, and the source of the Eng. word, it would account for the pronunciation (stō'mätjə), which is given in the pronouncing dictionaries of Kenrick (1773), Sheridan (1780), Walker (1791), Smart (1836), Worcester (1860), in Cassell's Encyclopedic Diet. (1888), and in Webster's Diet. (1828-1886). The genuineness of this pronunciation is attested by the spellings stomager (1450, 1727), stomackger (1575), stomaticher (17...), and stomacher (c 1450 onwards): the spelling with k is evidenced only once (c 1460), though the word occurs frequently in writers who wrote the word stomach with k. The pronunciation (stō'mäkəj) was given by Ogilvie Inferial Dict. (1850) and appears in later editions of that work and in recent U. S. diets. It is not impossible that estomacher was really formed in late Anglo-French, and is the source of the Eng. word. For the sense cf. the misuse of stomach for 'chest' (STOMACH sb. 3).

Story, sb. 2, storey (stōri). Pl. stories, storeys. Forms: 5 storeye, 6 storie, (storrie, store), 7- storey, ? 4, 5- story. [First in AL. form historia; hence prob. the same word as STORY sb. 1, though the development of sense is obscure.

Possibly historia as an architectural term may originally have denoted a tier of painted windows or of sculptures on the front of a building: see STORY sb. 1, 8, and cf. the Latin quot. 1398 below and sense 2.

The current view that the word is a. OF. estoree (f. estorer to build, furnish; see STORE v.) is untenable on account of the AL. form historia (from 12th c.).

The following are examples of the Anglo-Latin use of historia in the architectural sense:—

1. Each of the stages or portions one above the other of which a building consists; a room or set of rooms on one floor or level.

In this use synonymous with FLOOR sb. 5; but while in England the term FIRST-FLOOR is applied to the floor above the ground-floor, the numbering of 'stories' (so named) usually begins with the ground floor, so that the 'first-floor' is identical with the 'second story', and 'a house of one story' has a ground-floor only. A different usage is shown in quot. 1850, and appears to be not wholly obsolete.

Quot. a 1400, though the reading is app. the scribe's conjectural emendation of an obscure passage, may perh. be taken as attesting the existence of the sb. at the date of the MS.; the passage was prob. supposed to refer to the addition of 'stories' or upper stages to towers.

21. To strain at: to make a difficulty of 'swallowing' or accepting (something); to scruple at. Also (rarely), † to strain to do something.

This use is due to misunderstanding of the phrase 'strain at a gnat' in Matt. xxiii. 24. It has been asserted that 'strain at' in the Bible of 1611 is a misprint for 'straine out', the rendering of earlier versions (see 14 c). But quotes. 1583 and 1591 show that the translators of 1611 simply adopted a rendering that had already obtained currency. It was not a mistranslation, the meaning intended being 'which strain the liquor if they find a gnat in it'. The phrase, however, was early misapprehended (perh. already by Shaks. in quot. 1609), the verb being supposed to mean 'to make violent effort' (see sense 18).

Otherwise the word is purely northern, exc. for its occurrence in the Wyclif Bible and in Wyclif's sermons, and once in Spenser (who may have imitated Douglas).]

Stratum (strā'tm). Pl. strata (strā'ia); 9 rarely stratum. [a. mod. L. use of L. stratum, lit. something spread or laid down (in classical use with the senses 'bed-cover', 'horse-cloth', 'pavement'), neut. pa. pple. of sternere to throw down, lay prostrate, spread out. The precise application of the term has varied, some geologists having used it as equivalent to 'layer' or 'lamina'. In the collective plural strata, which is much the most frequent use, the distinction between the different uses commonly disappears.

2. Phrases, a. To make bricks without straw:

said with allusion to Exodus v.

The current form and application of the saying are hardly justified by the narrative. The Israelites were not required to make bricks without straw (which was an indispensable binding material for sun-dried bricks), but to gather the straw for themselves instead of having it furnished to them. The phrase, however, now commonly means 'to (be required) to produce results without the means usually considered necessary'. Cf. the accurate use in quot. 1661.

1658 in Verney Mem. (1907) II. 79 It is an hard task to make bricks without straw. 1661 DR. ORKNEY in 11th *Rep. Hist. MSS. b. With prefixed word, forming the proper name of a street. Abbreviated St., st.

In early examples these appellations were originally descriptive, as in the Broad street, the HIGH STREET. (In some towns, a name of this type still retains the definite article.) In modern nomenclature, the choice of the prefixed word is often arbitrary.

Modern usage is divided as to the writing of these names with hyphen or as two words. (In the 16-17th c. they were not unfrequently written as one word, e.g. 'Limestreete', Stow Surv. ed. 1603, p. 152.) It is to be observed that names ending in street are always stressed on the prefixed element, while those ending in road or lane have level stress: cf., e.g., Park-street with Park-la'ne, Park-road. c. 1275 in *Trans. c. In mod. Physics, used variously by different writers: see quotes.

1855 W. J. M. RANKINE Misc. Sci. Papers (1881) 120 In this paper, the word 'Strain' will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word 'Stress' will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it. 1856 THOMSON in Phil. Trans. CXLVI. 481 A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body. Ibid. note. It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr. Rankine's definition of the word 'stress', as I have applied it to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action. 1873 R. H. BOW Economics of Construction 45 note. The term stress expresses the condition of a part of the structure to the extremities of which are applied compressing or extending forces; the amount of the stress is measured by the magnitude of the force acting on either extremity; the strain is the change of length from elasticity which the part undergoes when subjected to the stress. 1873 MAXWELL Electr. & Magn. I. 59 The nature of this stress [in dielectrics] is... a tension along the lines of force combined with an equal pressure in all directions at right angles to these lines. 1896 GREENER Gim (ed. 6) 545 The stresses upon a gun are a radial stress or 'pressure'; a tangential stress, or hoop tension...; a longitudinal stress. 1911 J. A. EWING in Encycl. Brit. XXV. 1007/2 Stress is the mutual action between two bodies, or between two parts of a body, whereby each of the two exerts a force upon the other... A body is said to be in a state of stress when there is a stress between the two parts which lie on opposite sides of an imaginary surface of section.

Also, superior loudness of voice as a means of emphasizing one or more of the words of a sentence more than the rest. 1749 Power & Harmony Pros. The OE. forms representing the orig. Teut. conjugation are: strewjan, etc. (see STRAV v.) = Goth. strewjan, and pa. t. strawida = Goth. strawida. The original pre-stem in OE. (as in some other Teut. langs) was superseded by a new-formation after the pa. t. Owing to the influence of the following u, the unlaute -t became diphthongized, producing the forms strowen, strowu. The OE. forms with g or falling diphthong are represented by the a forms above, while strewen pronounced with a rising diphthong gave rise to the β forms. According to modern usage, the two spellings correspond to the two pronunciations; formerly, the spellings strew was often used where the time was a word like so, and conversely strow rhyming with new etc.

The rare y forms stroye are app. borrowed from or influenced by Du. strooien.

The pa. pple. is now most commonly strewen or strown in passive tenses, esp. where there is no distinct reference to an agent; and strewed, strowed in active tenses.]

Stride (strōid), v. Pa. t. strode (strōd), pa. pple. stridden (strid'n). Forms: 1 stridan, 3 striden, 4 strid, (3rd pers. sing. strit), 4-6 stryde, 5 strydyn, 4- stride. Pa. t. 4-9 north. strade, 5 Sr. straid, 5, 7 strad, 6 Sr. straide, 6 stryd, 7 strid, 7-9 strided, 5- strode. Pa. pple. 6 stridde, 7 strid, 9- stridden. [OE. stridan str. vb. (once only, but cf. bestridan, found once in pa. t. bestrad: see BESTRIDE v.) = (M)LG. striden str. vb., to set the legs wide apart, straddle, to take long steps; cf. LG. bestriden to bestride (a horse). The vb. is not found elsewhere in Teut. with similar sense, but is formally coincident and prob. identical with the str. vb. meaning to strive, quarrel: OFris. strida, (M)Du. strijden, MLG. striden, OHG. stritan (MHG. striten, mod.G. streiten); of the same or similar meaning are the weak verbs, OS. stridian (MLG. striden), ON. strida (Norw., Sw. strida; Da. stride is now conjugated strong); cf. OFris. OS. strid, Du. strijd, OHG. strit (mod.G. streit) masc. stride, quarrel, ON. strid neut. strife, grief, affliction (Norw., Sw., Da. strid), strida fem. adversity, severity, strid-stubborn, severe (Norw., Sw., Da. strid).

The primary meaning of the Teut. root 'strid' is commonly assumed to be 'contention' or 'strong effort'. On this view the Eng. sense of the vb., 'to take long steps' (sense 2 below), would be a development from the continental sense 'to strive'. This would in itself be possible, but sense 1 would remain unexplained. The assumption of a primary sense 'to diverge' (cf. Str. strid to go astray) would account plausibly on the one hand for the sense 'to quarrel', and on the other hand for the sense 'to straddle', from which the sense 'to take long steps' would be a natural development.

The recent examples show much uncertainty with regard to the conjugation. Perhaps (though this is far from certain) most people would give strode, stridden in answer to a grammatical question; but in actual speech and writing there is often hesitation as to the correct form. The pa. pple. rarely occurs; our material includes hardly any 19th or 20th c. examples of stridden, and not many of strided. In the pa. t. strode is certainly the usual form; but where the reference is to a single act and not to a manner of progression there seems to be a tendency to say strided ('I strided over the ditch').
